

Around The World

A comment on The Atlas of Creation on a personal Internet site:

Just a reminder that Americans aren't the only ones with creationist infestations:

In France warning signals have gone off after Harun "Atlas of Creation" were sent to schools across the nation. This caused concern in the scientific community.

Herve Le Guyader, a University of Paris biology professor who advised the Education Ministry on the Atlas, said high school biology teachers needed more training now to respond to the increasingly open challenges to the theory of evolution.

"It's often taught in a simplistic way." He said. "We have to give them the philosophical arguments they need to respond."

<https://www.harunyahya.info/en/articles/around-the-world>

Wednesday, March 28, 2007

Around the World

Just a reminder that Americans aren't the only ones with creationist infestations:

South African deputy Science and Technology minister, Derek Hanekom, said at the Opening the Saul SciFest 2007 science festival, that some teachers in his country are refusing to teach the concept of evolution despite the over-whelming scientific evidence that supports it.

In France, warning signals have gone off after Turkish Islamic creationist, Harun Yahya, made a mass mailing of free copies of his "Atlas of Creation" to schools across the nation. This caused concern in the scientific community:

Herve Le Guyader, a University of Paris biology professor who advised the Education Ministry on the Atlas, said high school biology teachers needed more training now to respond to the increasingly open challenges to the theory of evolution.

"It's often taught in a simplistic way," he said. "We have to give them the philosophical arguments they need to respond."

The head of the Russian Orthodox Church, Patriarch Alexy II, has banned the teaching of evolution in state schools as "unacceptable and there is the concept of evolution in Kenya to hide away its national treasure consisting of its collection of hominid fossils. Even the highly secular, law in belief British have had their recent controversies with its version of the Discovery Institute, Truth in Science, which also sent out unsolicited materials to schools.

Figures II comes with the teen jeans and DVD.

© posted by John Powell @ 10:00 AM