

PONY SKULL

If evolutionist logic were correct, ponies should long since have developed into larger horses. However, as the fossil record makes perfectly clear, ponies have survived for tens of millions of years without undergoing even the slightest change. This stability, or stasis, applies to all living species, and represents one of the most serious problems confronting Darwinism, because it demolishes evolution's fundamental claim, that all living things are descended from a supposed common ancestor and have diversified by one species evolving into others.
